CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

1.1 About the Film

“ALONE” is a 3-minute 45-second Tamil short film that explores the feeling of loneliness and the emotional impact of being unable to connect with friends. The film follows Benny, a young man who begins his morning hoping to meet his friends after seeing a reunion-related post on social media.

Throughout the morning, Benny repeatedly checks his phone, expecting a response from his friends. Instead, he receives notifications from unrelated services and apps, which gradually emphasize his feeling of isolation. When he finally checks the group chat, his friends decline his invitation to meet.

Rather than accepting the situation, Benny makes one more attempt to connect with a friend by calling them. His mood changes when he believes they have agreed to go out. He quickly gets ready, puts on his watch and earphones, and plays “En Iniya Thanimaye” as he prepares to leave. However, just as he opens the door, another phone call interrupts the moment. The screen goes blank, and Benny eventually comes out of the room frustrated and alone.

The film uses a single on-screen actor, limited locations, mobile-phone notifications, sound, music, and facial expressions to communicate the emotional experience of loneliness without requiring extensive dialogue. The story focuses on how a person can feel alone even while being surrounded by digital communication.

1.2 Background

The idea for “ALONE” was developed around a simple and relatable situation experienced by many young people — wanting to spend time with friends but gradually realizing that everyone is busy with their own lives. The film presents this situation through the daily routine of Benny and his repeated expectation of receiving a message from his friends.

The film uses mobile phones and social media notifications as an important part of the storytelling. Notifications from different applications create the expectation that someone is trying to contact Benny, while the actual messages from his friends reveal that they are unavailable. This contrast helps communicate his growing sense of loneliness without requiring lengthy conversations.

The project was designed as a single-actor short film that could be produced using simple locations and easily available equipment. The storytelling mainly depends on facial expressions, body language, phone-screen interactions, sound effects, music, camera framing, and editing. The continuation of the story further develops Benny's emotional state by showing his brief happiness when he believes he will finally go out, followed by frustration when that expectation is interrupted.

The main objective of the project is to gain practical experience in developing a short narrative from an original idea and presenting it effectively within a limited duration. The project also provides experience in screenplay writing, scene planning, acting, cinematography, sound design, music selection, editing, and visual storytelling.

1.3 Theme and Message

The central theme of “ALONE” is loneliness and the desire for human connection. The film shows how a person can feel isolated even when surrounded by digital communication through phones, social media, and notifications.

Benny's repeated expectation of receiving a message from his friends represents his desire to reconnect with them. The notifications from Amazon, messages, Swiggy, and Google Photos initially create anticipation, but none of them provide the companionship he is looking for. The old photograph shown through Google Photos further reminds him of the friendships he once had.

The film also explores the difference between expectation and reality. When Benny finally receives an opportunity to go out, his mood immediately changes and he becomes excited. He gets ready, puts on his watch and earphones, and prepares to leave. However, the unexpected interruption at the door brings back his frustration and loneliness.

The message of the film is that digital communication cannot always replace genuine human connection. A person may receive many notifications throughout the day and still feel alone when the meaningful connection they are hoping for is missing.

The film ultimately presents loneliness not through dramatic dialogue, but through silence, waiting, expressions, notifications, music, and Benny's actions, allowing the audience to experience his emotional state along with him.

CHAPTER 2

STORY & CHARACTERS

2.1 Story Synopsis

“ALONE” follows Benny, a young man who wakes up one morning hoping to reconnect with his friends. After seeing an Instagram Reel about a reunion, he sends a message to his newly created group chat asking, “Hi! Meet up??”.

As Benny gets ready, he repeatedly receives notifications on his phone. However, instead of hearing from his friends, the notifications are from Amazon, a message from an uncle, Swiggy, and Google Photos. The Google Photos notification shows him a memory of himself with his friends from three years earlier, making him reflect on the friendships he once had.

Benny then checks the group chat and discovers that all his friends are unable to meet. He reads their replies silently and places his phone face down. After a moment, he decides to make one more attempt and calls one of his friends. Although the friend's voice is never heard, Benny's side of the conversation shows that the friend agrees to go out with him. Benny becomes happy and says that he will come in five minutes.

Excited, Benny quickly gets ready. He wears his watch, takes his earphones and phone, and plays “En Iniya Thanimaye.” He walks toward the door with the hope of finally going out. Just as he opens the door, his phone rings. The screen goes blank, and after the interruption Benny comes out of the room frustrated.

The film ends with Benny standing alone, reinforcing the central idea of loneliness, expectation, and the desire for genuine human connection.

2.3 Character Development

Benny is the central character of the film, and his emotional state changes gradually throughout the story. At the beginning, he is relaxed and hopeful when he sees a reunion-related Reel and decides to invite his friends to meet.

As he gets ready, Benny repeatedly expects notifications from his friends. Instead, he receives unrelated notifications, and his initial excitement slowly turns into disappointment. The old photograph shown through Google Photos further reminds him of the friends and connections he had in the past.

When Benny finally reads the group-chat responses and realizes that his friends cannot meet, he becomes quiet and disappointed. Rather than arguing or repeatedly asking them, he puts the phone down and remains alone with his thoughts.

However, Benny does not completely give up. He makes one more attempt to connect by calling a friend. When he believes they have agreed to go out, his mood immediately changes from disappointment to happiness. He quickly gets ready, wears his watch, takes his earphones and prepares to leave.

The interruption at the door changes his emotional state once again. His brief excitement turns into frustration, leaving him alone at the end of the film.

2.4 Message

The film “ALONE” conveys the message that having constant digital communication does not necessarily mean having meaningful human connection. Benny receives several notifications throughout the morning, but none of them provide the companionship he is looking for.

The film also shows how loneliness can affect a person's emotions. Benny begins the day with hope, experiences disappointment when his friends are unavailable, and becomes happy again when he believes he may finally get an opportunity to go out. The sudden interruption at the end brings him back to the feeling of being alone.

Through Benny's experience, the film highlights the importance of genuine friendship, companionship, and human connection beyond social media and digital communication.

2.5 Use of Mobile Notifications and Digital Communication

Mobile notifications and digital communication play an important role in the storytelling of “ALONE.” Instead of depending on lengthy conversations, the film uses Benny's phone to reveal his expectations, memories, and emotional state.

The story begins with Benny seeing an Instagram Reel related to a reunion. This motivates him to message his friends and ask whether they can meet. As he gets ready, several notifications appear on his phone. However, the notifications are from Amazon, a message from his uncle, and Swiggy rather than from the friends he is waiting for.

The use of different notifications creates a contrast between digital activity and meaningful communication. Although Benny's phone is constantly receiving notifications, he is still waiting for one particular connection — a response from his friends.

The Google Photos notification is especially important because it brings an old memory of Benny with his friends onto the screen. This connects the present situation with his past and helps communicate his loneliness visually.

The film therefore uses mobile communication not only as a realistic part of Benny's daily life, but also as a storytelling device that reveals his emotional journey.

2.6 Symbolism of the Phone

The phone is one of the most important symbolic elements in “ALONE.” Throughout the film, Benny repeatedly looks at his phone because he expects it to provide the connection he is looking for.

At the beginning, the phone represents hope and expectation. Benny sees the reunion Reel and immediately uses his phone to contact his friends.

As the story progresses, the same phone becomes a source of disappointment. Benny receives several notifications, but none of them are the response he is waiting for. Even the Google Photos memory reminds him of the friendships he had in the past. When Benny finally reads the group-chat responses and discovers that his friends cannot meet, he places the phone face down. This action visually represents his temporary acceptance of the situation.

Later, Benny picks up the phone again and makes one more attempt to connect with a friend. His change in expression shows how strongly he associates the phone with the possibility of companionship.

Thus, the phone represents connection, expectation, memory, disappointment, and hope throughout the film.

2.7 Emotional Progression

The emotional progression of “ALONE” is mainly communicated through Benny's facial expressions, body language, actions, silence, phone interactions, and changes in his behaviour. Since Benny is the only on-screen character, his performance carries most of the emotional development of the story.

Stage	Benny's Emotional State
Beginning	Calm and hopeful
Seeing the reunion Reel	Interested and happy
Waiting for friends' response	Expectant
Receiving unrelated notifications	Disappointed
Seeing the old photograph	Nostalgic and emotional
Reading friends' replies	Lonely and disappointed
Calling a friend	Hopeful
Getting ready to go out	Happy and excited
Opening the door	Hopeful and confident
Final interruption	Frustrated and emotionally drained
Ending	Alone and quiet

The progression begins with Benny's hope of reconnecting with his friends. As the expected response does not arrive, his excitement gradually changes into disappointment. The old photograph intensifies this feeling by reminding him of his past friendships.

After reading the group-chat responses, Benny becomes silent rather than angry. He then makes one more attempt to connect with a friend, which briefly changes his emotional state from loneliness to happiness.

The final interruption reverses this positive change. Benny ends the film frustrated and alone, completing the emotional journey from hope → expectation → disappointment → hope again → happiness → frustration → loneliness.

CHAPTER 3

PRE-PRODUCTION

3.1 Script Development

The screenplay for “ALONE” was developed around the theme of loneliness and the desire for genuine human connection. The initial story was planned as a short film focusing on a single character, Benny, and his attempt to reconnect with his friends.

The screenplay was structured around Benny's morning routine. The story begins with him waking up and seeing an Instagram Reel related to a reunion. This leads him to message his friends and ask whether they can meet. From this point, the story develops through a series of phone notifications, each creating an expectation that his friends may have replied.

The screenplay was later extended to approximately 3 minutes and 45 seconds. The continuation develops Benny's emotional state after he discovers that his friends cannot meet. Instead of ending immediately, Benny makes one more attempt to connect with a friend through a phone call. His brief happiness while preparing to go out creates an emotional contrast with the final interruption.

The script was designed to remain simple enough to be produced with one on-screen actor and limited locations. The storytelling therefore relies heavily on facial expressions, body language, phone-screen interactions, sound effects, music, pauses, and visual transitions rather than requiring multiple actors or complex locations.

Special attention was given to the pacing of the notifications and Benny's reactions. The repeated expectation of receiving a message gradually builds the emotional impact of the group-chat scene and the final sequence. This structure allows the film to communicate the experience of loneliness within a short runtime while maintaining a simple and realistic narrative.

3.2 Scene Planning

The scenes in “ALONE” were planned according to the emotional progression of Benny and the limited production requirements of the film. The screenplay was divided into short, visually clear scenes so that the story could move naturally from hope to disappointment and finally to frustration.

The major scenes were planned as follows:

1. First Wake-Up – Benny wakes up at 6:20 AM and switches off his alarm before going back to sleep.
2. The Notification – Benny wakes again, sees a reunion-related Instagram Reel, and messages his friends asking to meet.
3. Getting Up – Benny gets out of bed and begins his morning routine.
4. Amazon – He receives an unrelated delivery notification instead of a reply from his friends.
5. Boomer Uncle – Another notification appears, but it is only a greeting from his uncle.
6. Swiggy – Benny interrupts his bath expecting a message, only to find a food notification.
7. Google Photos – An old photograph of Benny with his friends appears, creating a nostalgic emotional moment.
8. The Group Chat – Benny finally checks the chat and discovers that his friends cannot meet.
9. The Reaction – Benny becomes quiet, places his phone face down, and remains alone.

10. One More Try – Benny calls one of his friends and asks whether they can go out.
11. Getting Ready – After receiving a positive response, Benny happily gets ready, wears his watch, and takes his earphones and phone.
12. En Iniya Thanimaye – Benny plays the song through his earphones and prepares to leave.
13. The Door – Benny opens the door, but an unexpected phone call interrupts the moment.
14. Alone – The screen goes blank and Benny comes out frustrated, ending the film alone.

The scene planning was kept simple so that the film could be produced primarily within the bedroom, bathroom, and entrance/hallway areas. Since Benny is the only on-screen character, particular attention was given to his movements, expressions, phone interactions, pauses, and continuity between scenes. The planning also allows the notifications and sound cues to act as transitions between different emotional stages of the story.

3.3 Locations

The film “ALONE” was planned using simple and easily accessible locations so that the production could remain focused on the character and the story. Since the film features only one on-screen actor, most of the scenes take place within a limited area.

The main locations used for the film are:

- Bedroom – The primary location where Benny wakes up, checks his phone, receives notifications, views the group chat, gets ready, and prepares to leave.
- Bathroom – Used for the bathing sequence, including the Swiggy notification moment.

- Hallway / Entrance – Used when Benny walks toward the door and prepares to leave the room.
- Doorway / Room Entrance – Used for the final sequence where Benny opens the door and the unexpected phone call interrupts his attempt to go out.

Using a small number of locations helped simplify the production process and allowed greater attention to be given to camera framing, actor performance, continuity, sound, and emotional storytelling. The locations also support the isolated atmosphere of the film by keeping Benny physically alone throughout the story.

3.4 Cast and Crew

The film “ALONE” follows a simple production structure with a single on-screen actor. The limited cast allows the film to focus primarily on the protagonist's emotions, expressions, and interactions with his surroundings. The screenplay and direction are handled by the same person to maintain consistency between the story and its visual presentation.

Benny Samuvel performs the role of Benny, the central character of the film. His performance is mainly communicated through facial expressions, body language, reactions to phone notifications, and silent moments. Jashwanth S V is responsible for writing and directing the film, developing the screenplay and guiding the presentation of each scene.

The simple cast and crew structure makes the production manageable while allowing greater attention to storytelling, camera framing, continuity, sound, music, and editing.

3.5 Production Planning

The production of “ALONE” was planned around a simple storyline, a single on-screen actor, and a limited number of locations. The planning focused on maintaining continuity between the bedroom, bathroom, and entrance sequences while ensuring that Benny's emotional progression was clearly captured.

The scenes were arranged according to the screenplay, beginning with Benny's morning routine and gradually developing through the phone notifications, the group-chat conversation, and his final attempt to meet a friend. Particular attention was given to the mobile phone, watch, earphones, towel, and other props, as these objects are directly involved in important moments of the story.

Camera positions and actor movements were planned before shooting to maintain consistent framing. Special attention was given to the notification scenes because Benny's reactions needed to appear natural and progressively change from expectation to disappointment. The final door sequence was also planned carefully to create a clear transition from Benny's excitement to frustration.

The production planning also included the use of sound effects, phone notification sounds, dialogue, and background music to support the emotional progression of the film. Since the film relies heavily on visual storytelling and a single actor, careful planning of expressions, pauses, movements, and timing was important for presenting the story effectively within the approximately 3-minute-45-second duration.

CHAPTER 4

PRODUCTION

4.1 Shooting Process

The shooting of “ALONE” was carried out according to the planned screenplay and scene structure. The production focused on capturing Benny's morning routine and gradually showing his changing emotional state through his actions and expressions.

The scenes were filmed mainly in the bedroom, bathroom, and entrance area, using a simple setup suitable for a single-actor short film. Different shots were recorded for important moments such as Benny waking up, checking his phone, reacting to notifications, viewing the old photograph, reading the group-chat messages, making the phone call, and preparing to leave.

Particular attention was given to continuity of the actor's movements, phone position, props, and camera framing between shots. Multiple takes were recorded whenever necessary to obtain natural expressions and suitable performances.

The final sequence required careful timing because Benny's mood changes from happiness while preparing to go out to frustration after the unexpected phone call. The shooting therefore focused on capturing these emotional changes clearly through facial expressions, body language, pauses, and camera shots.

4.2 Camera

The short film “ALONE” was shot using an iPhone camera. The iPhone provided a convenient and accessible setup for capturing the different scenes of the film while maintaining good image quality.

The camera was used to capture Benny's morning routine, phone interactions, facial expressions, and movements across the bedroom, bathroom, and entrance areas.

Different framing and shot compositions were used to highlight important moments, particularly his reactions to the notifications and the changes in his emotional state.

The use of an iPhone also made it easier to shoot the film with a simple production setup and limited equipment. Care was taken to maintain stable framing, consistent composition, proper lighting, and continuity between the different shots.

4.3 Lighting

The short film “ALONE” was filmed using the available natural and room lighting at the shooting locations. No additional professional lighting equipment was used.

The lighting was kept simple and natural to match the realistic, everyday atmosphere of the story. The bedroom, bathroom, and entrance scenes were lit according to the available conditions at the time of shooting.

Care was taken to maintain reasonably consistent lighting between different shots, particularly during scenes involving Benny's phone interactions and emotional reactions. The natural lighting also helped maintain the simple and realistic visual style of the film.

4.4 Audio

The audio for “ALONE” was recorded and edited to support the realistic and emotional tone of the film. The audio elements include dialogue, phone notification sounds, background music, and ambient sound.

The phone notification sounds are particularly important because they repeatedly create an expectation in Benny that his friends may have responded. These sounds help connect the different scenes and gradually build his emotional anticipation.

Benny's dialogue during the phone call is recorded from his side only, while the friend's voice is intentionally not heard. This allows the audience to focus on Benny's expressions and reactions rather than the conversation itself.

The song “En Iniya Thanimaye” is used during the sequence in which Benny gets ready to leave. The music temporarily creates a happier emotional tone before the unexpected phone call changes the mood.

The audio was carefully arranged during editing so that notification sounds, dialogue, music, pauses, and silence work together to support the emotional progression of the film.

4.5 Direction

The direction of “ALONE” focused on presenting the emotional journey of Benny through simple actions, expressions, and visual storytelling. Since the film has only one on-screen character, particular attention was given to Benny's facial expressions, body language, movements, and reactions throughout the scenes.

The direction aimed to gradually change Benny's emotional state from hopeful and expectant to disappointed, nostalgic, hopeful again, and finally frustrated and alone. His reactions to the different phone notifications were directed to become progressively more meaningful, allowing the audience to understand his feelings without requiring extensive dialogue.

The phone was used as an important visual element throughout the film. The direction focused on capturing Benny's interaction with the phone, including checking notifications, viewing the old photograph, reading the group-chat messages, making the phone call, and preparing to leave.

Special attention was also given to the final sequence. Benny's happiness while getting ready and listening to “En Iniya Thanimaye” was intentionally contrasted with the sudden interruption at the door. This change in mood helps strengthen the emotional impact of the ending and reinforces the central theme of the film.

CHAPTER 5

POST-PRODUCTION

5.1 Video Editing

The short film “ALONE” was edited using Adobe After Effects. The editing process focused on arranging the recorded footage according to the screenplay and maintaining a smooth flow between the different scenes.

The footage was trimmed and arranged to maintain the intended pacing of the film. Particular attention was given to the phone notification scenes, group-chat screen, Google Photos memory, phone-call sequence, and final door sequence, as these moments are important to the development of the story.

The editing also involved synchronizing dialogue, notification sounds, background music, and visual transitions with the corresponding scenes. The “En Iniya Thanimaye” music sequence was placed during Benny's preparation to leave, creating a temporary positive mood before the final interruption.

The final sequence was edited to create a clear transition when the phone call interrupts Benny at the door. The screen is then taken to black, followed by Benny's frustrated appearance, helping to create the emotional ending of the film.

5.2 Sound and Music

Sound and music were used in “ALONE” to support the emotional progression of the story and make the scenes more engaging. Different sound elements were incorporated according to the requirements of each scene.

Phone notification sounds were used repeatedly throughout the film. These sounds create anticipation whenever Benny hears a notification, as he expects it to be a message from his friends. The contrast between his expectation and the actual notifications helps communicate his growing disappointment.

The phone-call audio in the later part of the film was designed so that only Benny's side of the conversation is heard. The friend's voice is not played, allowing the audience to focus on Benny's expressions and reactions.

The song “En Iniya Thanimaye” is used when Benny gets ready to leave after believing that he will finally go out with his friend. The music creates a temporary change in mood and reflects Benny's happiness and excitement.

Sound effects, dialogue, music, and moments of silence were combined during post-production to support the film's realistic and emotional atmosphere.

5.3 Colour Correction

The colour correction for “ALONE” was carried out during the post-production process using Adobe After Effects. The main purpose of colour correction was to maintain a consistent visual appearance across the different shots recorded using the iPhone camera.

Adjustments were made where necessary to brightness, contrast, exposure, and overall colour balance so that the scenes appeared visually consistent. Particular attention was given to the bedroom, bathroom, and entrance sequences because they were recorded under different lighting conditions.

The colour treatment was kept natural and realistic to match the slice-of-life theme of the film. The visual tone was maintained throughout the film so that the audience could focus on Benny's performance and emotional progression without excessive colour effects.

5.4 Titles and Final Presentation

The final presentation of “ALONE” was designed to maintain a simple and clean visual style that matches the tone of the film. The title “ALONE” is presented clearly at the beginning and end of the film to establish the identity of the short film.

The final edited sequence was reviewed to ensure that the scenes, transitions, dialogue, sound effects, music, and visual elements were arranged in the correct order. Particular attention was given to the ending, where the screen goes blank after the unexpected phone call and Benny appears frustrated and alone.

The final film was presented as a 3-minute-45-second short film, combining the screenplay, acting, cinematography, sound, music, and editing into a single continuous narrative. The presentation was kept minimal and natural to support the film's central theme of loneliness and the desire for genuine human connection.

CHAPTER 6

CONCLUSION

6.1 Final Outcome

The short film “ALONE” was completed as an approximately 3-minute-45-second slice-of-life drama focusing on loneliness and the desire for genuine human connection. The film follows Benny through a morning in which he hopes to reconnect with his friends but gradually experiences disappointment through a series of phone notifications and messages.

The film successfully combines acting, smartphone cinematography, sound design, music, and video editing to present Benny's emotional journey. The use of a single on-screen actor and limited locations allowed the production to remain simple while keeping the focus on the protagonist.

The final sequence contrasts Benny's happiness and excitement while preparing to go out with the frustration caused by the unexpected interruption at the door. This provides an emotional ending that reinforces the central theme of the film.

Overall, the completed film demonstrates how simple locations, everyday situations, visual storytelling, and effective use of sound and editing can be combined to create a meaningful short film within a limited duration.

6.2 Challenges Faced

Several challenges were encountered during the production of “ALONE”. Since the film focuses mainly on a single character, particular attention had to be given to performance, continuity, camera framing, and timing.

Performance and Expressions:

As Benny is the only on-screen character, his emotions had to be communicated mainly through facial expressions, body language, and reactions. Capturing the gradual change from hope to disappointment and finally frustration required careful performance and multiple takes.

Continuity:

Maintaining continuity between different shots was important, particularly with Benny's clothing, phone, watch, earphones, towel, and position within the room. Consistent positioning and movement were required to make the scenes appear natural.

Audio:

The notification sounds, dialogue, phone-call sequence, and background music had to be properly synchronized with the visuals. The friend's voice was intentionally not included during the phone call, making Benny's reactions especially important.

Limited Production Setup:

The film was shot using an iPhone camera and available locations and lighting. This required careful planning of camera positions, framing, and lighting conditions to maintain consistent footage.

Editing:

The footage had to be carefully arranged and edited using Adobe After Effects. Particular attention was given to the timing of notifications, music, transitions, and the final phone-call interruption so that the intended emotional impact was maintained.

6.3 Learning Outcomes

The making of “ALONE” provided practical experience in different stages of the filmmaking process. The major learning outcomes from the project include:

- Understanding how an original idea can be developed into a short-film screenplay.
- Learning how to structure scenes and maintain a clear beginning, middle, and ending within a limited duration.
- Gaining practical experience in acting and directing a single-character film.
- Understanding the importance of facial expressions, body language, and visual storytelling in communicating emotions.
- Learning basic camera framing and shot composition using an iPhone camera.
- Understanding the importance of continuity between different shots and scenes.
- Gaining experience in recording and arranging dialogue, notification sounds, music, and ambient audio.
- Learning video editing using Adobe After Effects.
- Understanding basic colour correction and maintaining visual consistency between shots.
- Learning how music and sound effects can be used to support the emotional progression of a story.
- Understanding how simple locations and limited resources can be used effectively in short-film production.
- Developing skills in storytelling, planning, time management, and creative problem-solving.

6.4 Overall Conclusion

The making of “ALONE” provided practical experience in developing and presenting a short-film narrative from an original idea. The project explored the theme of loneliness and the desire for genuine human connection through a simple and relatable story centered on Benny.

The film demonstrated how screenplay writing, acting, iPhone cinematography, direction, sound, music, and video editing can be combined to communicate an emotional story within a limited duration. The use of mobile notifications, social media interactions, silence, and music helped convey Benny's changing emotional state without relying on extensive dialogue.

The project was completed using a simple production setup with limited locations and a single on-screen actor. This allowed greater focus on performance, visual storytelling, continuity, camera composition, and editing. The post-production process using Adobe After Effects further provided practical experience in arranging footage, synchronizing audio, applying colour correction, and creating the final presentation.

Overall, “ALONE” demonstrates that an effective short film can be created with accessible equipment and simple locations when the story, performance, visual presentation, sound, and editing work together effectively.
